The "native bern" to whom Kipling refers are the colonial bred subjects of the queen, whose homes are scattered all the way around the globe. They are all supposed to be extremely loyal to the imperial government. Other writers than Mr. Kipling have assured us of this. There remains also the authority of the English musle hall sin-

Fresher and stronger proof of the loyalty of England's colonists is the fact that colonial troops are now fighting in South Africa. Some have been sent from Canada and some from New Zealand. New Lord Roberts wants pative lancers from India, and Kitchener probably longs for some of his Egyptian troops.

While the mounted police almost to a man are anxious to be sent to war, it has been suggested that the withdrawal of a large number would be impractical and that there are enough exmembers to fill the ranks many times.

Since the announcement that more troops would be accepted from Canada the recruiting offices of the Dominion have been througed with volunteers, and the work of selection is now going on with just the same severity of physical requirement as is exercised in the enlistment of regulars for the British service. As a majority of the volunteers are ex-mounted policemen there is little to be done in the way of drilling them for their work in Africa. The Canadian mounted police force is the -We have just received 300 shirts from best drilled and most perfectly disciplined of its kind in the world. Its peculiar adaptability to the service required, that of scouting and general cavalry maneuvering in a rough country, is recognized, the work of the police being practically all mounted work and in a country requiring the greatest possible measure of easy adaptability to circumstances.
